WASHINGTON, Dec.

CHAPTER 49.

Instead of showing sorrow over the death of the mysterious woman flarwood heaved a sigh of relief. Not one pang of refret occurred to this man of the world over the wrong had done. As is usually the way in such cases, the man goes blithely on his way—there is no "scarlet letter" for him, while an unmarked grave usually is the end of the road for the woman.

Harwood had sent all that remained of the mysterious woman back to the little town they had both lift so happily not so many years before. He had paid all expenses readily—most too readily, it seemed Tafter Ann had explained the situation to him. But for any other feeling in the matter he did not show one sign. He still was much taken with Ann, but after the episode aboard the yacht he was at a loss how to try to win her. He suspected the mysterious woman had told Ann all about his intentions before she died, and in this he was never more right in his life, for that poor soul had told Ann everything about Harwood and his past life.

One day Ann's father received a wondering if there was anything you note from Harwood asking life to call at his apartment—the same wond was fingering a large roll of bills as he was talking.
